Announce Changes in Burley Tobacco

The U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) announced June 10, changes in policy governing the transfer of burley tobacco quotas that would permit transfer to farmers not presently holding a quota and which had previously required a farm to hold a burley quota before permitting the transfer of additional quota poundage.

(Under the Burley Program, unlike the programs for other types of tobacco, quotas are expressed in terms of poundage rather than acreage.)

Under the new program, transfers to nonquota farms will be subject to the same terms and conditions that currently apply to transfers to quota farms. The main exception will be that the quotas indicated on marketing cards issued to nonquota farms by USDA's Agricultural Stabilization and Conservation Service (ASCS) will be limited to the actual poundage leased. The burley tobacco program permits only the lease, not the sale, of quota poundage.

USDA officials feel that the change in policy is necessary to permit a number of interested individuals, not currently eligible for a new farm quota, to enter the burley tobacco market.

Just as with transfers to quota farms, quota leases to nonquota farms will be filed with the local ASCS office or USDA Service Center and will have to be between farms in the same county.

Then there was the man who said - When I get a new suit of clothes, I tend to puff up and start acting like I know fancy ways. Then, I remember we owe our very existance to a 6-inch layer of topsoil. A very deflating thought!

When I get a new car, I tend to puff up and start acting like I own property. Then, I remember we all owe our very existence to a tiny 1% of water available to man. The other 99% is tied up in salty seas (96%) and ice at each pole (3%). A very deflating thought!

buildings, nurseries, barns, and fences, or it is sold to various state agencies, with the Park Service, Game Commission, Vocational Agriculture Department, and Highway Department comprising the main purchasers of the lumber and posts.

In post production, all wood is peeled at the Center. At this stage of the process, many posts are sold wholesale to treatment plants. The Forestry Center treats the remaining posts and sells them locally to individuals and to state agencies, while retaining some posts for use by the Division of Forestry.

Tree Improvement, the third area of operations in the Appomattox - Buckingham Forestry Center, is concentrated on the 149 acre seed orchard situated on the Center's premises. Established in 1968, the seed orchard is designed to produce a genetically-superior seed. One-hundred and five acres are planted is loblolly pine, while 32 acres are in white pine, and 12 acres are producing Virginia pine.

After individual pine trees are tested to insure genetic superiority, they are planted to produce seeds, or the pine cones. Once the seeds are ripe, they are shaken off the tree, picked up by a vacuum-like harvester, and sent to state-owned nurseries in either New Kent or Augusta. The subsequent seedlings are sold to anyone in the state.

Although the seed orchard is not yet self-sufficient, Stanley was optimistic that it would be in the near future. He pointed out that the project was relatively new at seven years old and thus needed more time to become economically independent. Presently, the seed orchard is partially subsidized by state and federal grants.

Overall, with its sale of timber to woodcutters and its lumber and post production, the local Division of Forestry is self-funding. Included in its gross budget of $840,000 is a one-quarter allocation that is given annually to the five counties under the local Division's jurisdiction. Each county's exact share is determined according to the timber cut in forests of the county. In August of 1974, the Virginia Division of Forestry presented Appomattox County with $15,-154.57, which was Appomattox's portion of the one-fourth gross proceeds from timber cut from the Appomattox-Buckingham State Forest.

The three operations of the Appomattox-Buckingham Forestry Center, forest management, timber and post production, and tree improvement, compose an integral part of the services provided by the local Division of Forestry. More significantly, the operations of the Forestry Center benefit not only the people of Appomattox County, but also the entire state of Virginia.
